“The 25th anniversary edition of FIFA brings a number of innovative gameplay improvements based on real-life player data that ensure your goal is more likely to be scored after a perfect free-kick, dribble or a corner,” said senior gameplay designer Andreas Bergdorf. “You’ll also see clearer visual effects from aerial duels, run-ins and tackles, which make for more realistic goal-scoring opportunities as the ball hits the ground. We’ve also brought significant improvements to the player identity animations, including the ability to catch a ball in any direction, or to kick the ball while on the move. We’re confident that HyperMotion Technology will deliver even more believable and impactful moments in FIFA.” And of course, it would be FIFA without the ever-popular player ratings. FIFA 20 changed the way players are ranked on the pitch, and this year’s edition has even more improved player ratings. In FIFA 20, player attributes have been reworked. They've been improved by comparing players' real-world attributes (speed, dribbling, jumping and shooting) with the player's capacity to achieve those attributes. Two attributes control a player's skill: "Granularity" and "Overall Performance." Higher granularity values mean players have a more specific set of skills, but will get scored lower in overall performance. "For example, a player with a higher Granularity value can score higher in a sport like tennis than a player with a lower Granularity value," Bergdorf said. "Granularity values are higher in FIFA than in other sports in order to reflect these different levels of skill." FIFA 20 also includes new Player Attributes. They include ability to dribble and pass forward, dribble and pass backwards and stationary shot. In addition to the new ratings system, FIFA 20 adds a new control scheme, which allows players to use the left or right sticks to move the ball, and the A, B, X and Y buttons to dribble or pass. Players can also pick up their pace and direction with the left thumbstick to use their run, or to control the player's speed with the left stick. The left stick is used in all player positions, while the right stick is used to control player movement. One of the most asked-for changes in the

The association between serum sialic acid (SSA), ictal/interictal EEG findings and seizures in patients with epilepsy was investigated. Eighteen patients with clinically well-defined partial epilepsy (18-53 years old, 12 men, 6 women) and 8 healthy controls participated in this study. SSA levels were measured in peripheral blood collected from patients just before seizure and the results were compared with ictal/interictal EEG findings as well as seizure history. The mean serum SSA values in the patients with seizures and those without seizures were significantly higher than those in the controls. The areas under the receiver operating characteristic curves to discriminate patients with and without seizures were 0.99 and 0.86, respectively. The cut-off values of SSA for detection of seizures were 33.9 microg/mL and 24.4 microg/mL, respectively. The postictal SSA levels are positively correlated with postictal EEG changes. There were no significant correlations between SSA levels and seizure history. This study demonstrates that serum SSA levels are increased in patients with epilepsy and that they are associated with ictal and interictal EEG findings, suggesting that monitoring of SSA may be useful for prediction of seizure occurrence.Comparative proteomic profile of human colorectal carcinoma and the
