Q: How to check if javascript is enabled? I'd like to check if my browser supports javascript. I.E. if You are using IE8 and I've a jQuery plugin for IE6 and above, you automatically get the behaviour's of IE6 and above: $.fn.whatever = function(){ ... } But for IE8... no way... Does someone have an idea how to detect this? A: You can use jQuery's.noConflict() function to convert the jQuery namespace for the plugin function name away from the $ namespace: // window.jQuery would be undefined if (typeof jQuery!="") jq.noConflict(); Then you can just use jQuery, which will throw an error if IE8 doesn't support it (or current versions). if (! jq.support.noConflict) /* Determine IE version / jq.support.noConflict = function(){ / check IE version and fire a JS error */ } This is a function which gets the version of IE which a user's browser has and then launches an alert. Of course, as noted in the comments, if a website does also use jQuery in their code which they'd prefer to use instead of the native version, then you could run into issues. You could also get a false positive if the user has a browser which supports the relevant syntax and wants a certain plugin or behaviour but isn't running the latest version of the browser. A: Slightly more robust but less specific way of doing what is needed for cross-browser support: alert(jQuery.support.postMessage); Or: alert(jQuery.support.orientation); The answer to the question "Does Javascript support postMessage()?" will be "yes, and here is why.." A: First jQuery version can detect unsupported browser (only IE, Opera, Firefox,
